Police departments and law enforcement have used facial recognition technology for more than a decade. But it has spread to stores and entertainment venues over the past few years.

Images and video are retained only as long as necessary for security purposes and then disposed of. For security reasons, we do not disclose the exact retention period, but it aligns with...

HARRISON, NY -- Wegmans, a supermarket chain with 100 stores in 10 primarily East Coast states and the District of Columbia, including the Hudson Valley, has begun scanning the faces of anyone...

The information is used to "protect the safety and security of our patrons and employees," according to the signage. The new scanning policy is an expansion of a 2024 pilot.

Even more troubling, Wegmans has declined to clarify how long biometric data is retained, who can access it, or whether it could be shared with third parties -- including law enforcement agencies.

"Images and video are retained only as long as necessary for security purposes and then disposed of." Facial recognition scan data is not shared with any third party, Wegman said.

NEW YORK -- When you're grocery shopping, you may not realize what's being caught on camera. Some supermarkets are using facial recognition technology to catch thieves, but there are...

New York City has a quirky new law that makes it the only municipality in the country where a business scanning faces has to post a sign telling customers that it is doing so. After I left the...

Some grocery stores are beginning to implement it to enhance security, streamline checkout, and personalize marketing. While this promises more convenience, it also raises significant concerns about data ...
